The ferry left the harbour before dawn, its deck still wet from the night rain, and the few passengers stood along the rail to watch the lights of the town grow small behind them while the gulls followed in the wake.

By noon the far shore had come into view, a low green line under a pale sky, and the captain sounded the horn twice as the boat turned toward the narrow channel that led into the sheltered bay on the northern side.