The lamp room was cold that night, and the keeper wrapped his hands around a cup of tea while the wind pushed hard against the glass of the lantern and the light turned slowly above the dark water, sweeping across the harbour wall and the boats that were waiting for the tide to come back in.